Metro | Ottawa

Gatineau police are searching for a suspect in a shooting at a hotel Monday night that left one woman dead.

Police received a 911 call from someone reporting that they heard a gunshot just after 8 p.m. at the Four Points Sheraton at 35 Rue Laurier, which is located across the street from the Canadian Museum of History.

Police confirmed Tuesday that a 25-year-old woman was killed. Police would not release any other information about her identity.

Police put the hotel on lockdown Monday night and requested that anyone entering or leaving the building check in with officers first.

However, the lockdown was lifted Tuesday morning.

Police remain tight-lipped about the investigation and where they are focusing their search for the suspect.

Police spokeswoman Const. Andrée East said there is no threat to public safety.

"For now we won't release any more information about the circumstances or the person we are looking for — or about the victim — because we don't want to compromise the investigation that is ongoing," said East.

This is Gatineau's first homicide of 2015.

LABOUR RELATIONS

Unions look to Liberals

Michael Woods
Metro | Ottawa

For federal public service unions, a Liberal majority could signal a new era with the government after years of increasingly acrimonious relations.

"A lot of our members are going to work very happy today, knowing that the Harper Conservatives are no longer their employer," said Chris Aylward, national vice-president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada.

Public service unions ran campaigns against Harper to an unprecedented degree during the campaign. Now, with a new government, the task of repairing the relationship begins.

Union leaders wasted no time Tuesday reminding prime minister-designate Justin Trudeau of his promises to restore funding to public services and bargain in good faith.

"We look forward to sitting down with the new government as soon as possible to discuss how to repair the damage done by the Harper Conservatives, including how to improve labour relations," Aylward said.

Unions want the Liberals to repeal aspects of Conservative omnibus budget bills to do with collective bargaining rights.

"Mr. Trudeau promised in this election to restore collective bargaining rights, and we expect him to honour that," Aylward said. "We're looking for a new era of restoring trust, where our members' voices are valued and respected."

The union which represents federal scientists, the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada, called on Trudeau to pass fair and balanced labour laws.

Debi Daviau wrote a letter to Trudeau calling for "quick action on key commitments" made during the campaign, such as unmuzzling scientists, reinvesting in public services and repealing recent "anti-union legislation."

At a rally at the Westin Hotel after arriving back in Ottawa on Tuesday, Trudeau told supporters that the Liberals would return to evidence-based policy and promised "a government that listens to, works with and respects the public service."

Trudeau ponders cabinet

NEW GOVERNMENT

Several Ottawa and area MPs may be under consideration

Michael Woods
Metro | Ottawa

Building a cabinet is a delicate exercise for any new prime minister. There are many factors to take into consideration, including geographical representation, political experience, and ethnic and linguistic diversity.

There are many factors to take into consideration, including geographical representation, political experience, and ethnic and linguistic diversity. Trudeau has also promised gender parity.

Prime Minister-designate Justin Trudeau has also promised gender parity in his cabinet. And while cabinet grew to 40 people under Stephen Harper, it's believed Trudeau's will be smaller.

The Liberal wave that swept over the country — and the national capital region — on Monday evening means several new Ottawa-area members of Parliament are possible candidates for cabinet posts.

Although they are all strong options, it's unlikely they would all be appointed given the need for geographical diversity in cabinet.

Andrew Leslie, a star candidate who won in a landslide in Orleans, will likely be a part of Trudeau's cabinet. The retired lieutenant general and former chief of the land staff would be an obvious fit for defence. However, given his long military career, he might be appointed to a related portfolio that doesn't directly involve DND, such as public safety.

Karen McCrimmon ran for the Liberal leadership in 2013, and former leadership candidates are often rewarded with cabinet posts when parties attain government. She's the first woman to ever command a Canadian Forces flying squadron, and would be a good fit for the veterans affairs portfolio.

David McGuinty won a fifth straight mandate in Ottawa South. He has held several critic portfolios in the past, including transport, environment, natural resources and Opposition House Leader. He's among the most experienced Liberal MPs and is a logical choice to

Logistics must be settled

Once the cabinet is named, the MPs are sworn in and the logistics are settled, the Governor General will officially summon Parliament. The MPs will gather in the Commons chamber and then be called to the Senate, where they will be told that their first order of business will be to go back and elect a Speaker. With that chore done, the government can then bring in its speech from the throne and begin the new Liberal era.

be the minister responsible for the National Capital Region.

Catherine McKenna upset popular incumbent Paul Dewar in Ottawa Centre. An international trade lawyer and former UN legal advisor, McKenna campaigned on a four-point plan to reform the National Capital Commission, as well as moving the controversial memorial to the victims of communism away from its planned location near the Supreme Court — matters that the minister responsible for the National Capital Region oversees.

Anita Vandenbeld won in John Baird's old riding in Ottawa West-Nepean. She's also a rookie MP, but as a longtime UN advisor and democratic governance expert, will surely play a role in the Liberals' democratic reform efforts. Trudeau pledged during the campaign that Monday's election would be the last conducted under the first-past-the-post system.

Mayor expects collaboration with new MPs

Lucy Scholey

An Ontario Liberal government, a former Liberal MPP as Ottawa's mayor and, now, a majority federal Liberal government.

This red surge bodes well for the City of Ottawa, according to Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson.

"The last thing people like seeing are squabbles between three orders of government," he said, speaking the Tuesday morning after the federal Liberals' majority government win, including eight out of nine Ottawa-area ridings. "I think you'll see a much more concerted effort to get along and work well with the city, with local community groups and with the provincial government."

Watson said he will let the new MPs settle in before getting to work on significant Ottawa city projects left in limbo. That includes the Ottawa River clean-up plan, the second phase of the light rail transit project, the new central public library and the widely criticized Memorial to the Victims of Communism.

I think you'll see a much more concerted effort to get along.

Ottawa Mayor Jim Watson

Already, the Liberals have pledged to pitch in a third of the $3-billion phase two of light rail expansion.

Watson described the relationship with the former Conservative government as "a challenge" when it came to lobbying federal funding for the light rail transit project and to clean up the Ottawa River.

"The federal government was always the last one to the table after a lot of pushing, but eventually they got there so I give them credit," he said.

While Watson had his criticisms for the Conservatives, he praised Pierre Poilievre, Ottawa's last remaining Conservative MP in the new Carleton riding. He said the former minister of the National Capital Commission now has an important role to play when it comes to fighting for the city's needs.

Watson said he already has a positive relationship with Justin Trudeau. The prime minister-designate called the mayor at home to consult him on the $125-billion infrastructure plan.

"To have a premier that I can pick up the phone and speak with and a prime minister who I have a good relationship with will help the City of Ottawa," Watson said. "There will be times when we disagree and there will be times when we are in sync."

RECORD VOTE

Ottawa ridings boast highest voter turnout

Two Ottawa ridings boasted the highest voter turnout in Canada on election day.

An impressive 77,811 ballots were cast in Orleans on Oct. 19, which amounts to an 80.91 per cent voter turnout in the riding, according to Elections Canada's preliminary results.

Ottawa Centre placed second overall with 75,332 voters at the polls. Proportionally, the turnout there was higher, at 82.2 per cent.

Former Canadian general Andrew Leslie beat Conservative Orleans incumbent Royal Galipeau with 59.8 per cent of the vote. In Ottawa Centre, Catherine McKenna beat out longtime NDP MP Paul Dewar with 42.6 per cent of the vote.

As for Ottawa overall, the voter turnout was 78 per cent, not including electors registered on election day.

Across the country, voter turnout jumped about seven percentage points from 2011 — to 68.5 per cent from 61.1 per cent. It's the highest voter turnout since 1993. LUCY SCHOLEY/METRO

The memorial to the victims of communism probably won't be erected in its controversial planned location on the lawn southwest of the Supreme Court building — long reserved for a Federal Court building. Incoming Ottawa Centre MP Catherine McKenna campaigned on finding a new location for the memorial.

2 New central library

McKenna pledged to fight for federal money for a new central library branch. Ottawa's public library board endorsed a plan to build a $86-million branch. McKenna said she wants the branch to be in Ottawa Centre.

3 NCC reform

The National Capital Commission is more transparent than it used to be, but McKenna ran on several proposals to reform the commission, led by CEO Mark Kristmanson (above). Those include: mandating that all major developments on public land be subject to meaningful public consultation; make board meetings open by default; require its board of directors to have an equal number of women and men and have indigenous representation; and formalizing representation for the cities of Ottawa and Gatineau on the board.

4 Portrait gallery

The former U.S. embassy on Wellington Street has sat empty since 1999. Then-prime minister Jean Chrétien approved plans for it to become a portrait gallery, but Harper scrapped those plans in 2006. McKenna has called for consultations on a possible revival.

5 Long-form census

The Liberals have pledged to bring back the long-form census, which the Conservatives scrapped amid much criticism in 2010 and replaced with the voluntary National Household Survey.

Trudeau's win buoys Wynne

ELECTION 2015

Premier ready to work with new PM to help Ontarians

Premier Kathleen Wynne says Canada now has a federal leader willing to work with the provinces on a range of issues, but Ontario won't be presenting Justin Trudeau with a list of demands.

Wynne took an unusually high profile for a premier in the federal campaign, clashing publicly with Conservative leader Stephen Harper and urging voters to support Trudeau's Liberals and what she said was his more positive vision for the country.

"Last night Canadians gave our government the real federal partner that we need in order to make progress together," said Wynne. "We will once again have a partner in Ottawa with the same values and the same priorities, not just of the government of Ontario, but much more importantly, of the people of Ontario."

There's no quid pro quo in the relationship that means Trudeau owes Wynne for helping propel his Liberals from third place to a majority government, she said.

"I want to just be clear that this is not about a transactional checking of boxes, that's not what the relationship is about," said Wynne. "It is not a matter of me taking my list to Ottawa and saying: 'Okay, now you have to deliver on these things.'"

Wynne is optimistic Trudeau does want to enhance the Canada Pension Plan, but said he can't do it alone so Ontario will still proceed with its own provincial pension for now, with mandatory contributions from employers and workers.

"He has to work with all of the provinces, so we are going to continue to work on implementing the Ontario Retirement Pension Plan," she said. "We can't stop because there's a time commitment we've made to the people of Ontario."

I'm thrilled as the premier of Ontario that we have a federal government now that wants to work with the provinces ... that will develop relationships that will allow us to solve the problems that we face.

Kathleen Wynne

The provincial pension plan is scheduled to begin on Jan. 1, 2017.

She's also hopeful Trudeau will follow through on his promises to "make massive investments" in transit, roads and bridges, which dovetails with Ontario's 10-year, $130-billion infrastructure plan.

"Now that we have a federal partner with the same priorities, we can do more, and we can do it faster," said Wynne. "Trudeau has been talking about the importance of those investments throughout this campaign."

Wynne warned that she and Trudeau won't always agree on every issue, but said all the provinces are looking forward to working with a more co-operative federal government on everything from jobs and the economy to the refugee crisis and the need for an inquiry into missing and murdered aboriginal women.

"I'm thrilled as the premier of Ontario that we have a federal government now that wants to work with the provinces, that will come to meetings, that will develop relationships that will allow us to solve the problems that we face," she said. "Do not underestimate how important that is for the future of this country."

The first test of Trudeau's willingness to work with the provinces will be as Canada develops a strategy for next month's climate change talks in France, said Wynne.

"The first manifestation of that partnership is one that you're going to see when we travel to Paris on climate change, and the commitment that Justin Trudeau has made to work with provinces in order to support our initiatives to reduce greenhouse gas emissions," she said.

Asked about Trudeau's plans to legalize marijuana, Wynne said "it's an issue whose time has come in terms of a national discussion."

Medical cannabis users look forward to growing their own medicine. Prime minister-designate Justin Trudeau promised to regulate marijuana. MARCUS OLENIUK/TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE

Cannabis users say relief is in sight

Lucy Scholey
Metro | Ottawa

Laurie MacEachern is one of tens of thousands of the country's medicinal cannabis users — and millions of recreational tokers — rejoicing over the Liberal majority election win on Monday.

With Prime minister-designate Justin Trudeau's plan to regulate marijuana, MacEachern said she's looking forward to growing her own medicine.

"We who need cannabis as medicine have been fighting for our lives, against our own government, for our right to live," MacEachern, director of the Medicinal Cannabis Patients' Alliance of Canada Inc., told Metro over Facebook chat. "I am relieved that the battle seems to be over."

MacEachern, a Cornwall, Ont., grandmother, relies on cannabis to treat fibromyalgia, irritable bowel syndrome, idiopathic neuropathy and a spinal injury. If she can grow her own medicine, it will cost about $500 a year, as opposed to the roughly $50,000 a year through Health Canada's current program.

Recreational tokers should pay a tax, but medicinal cannabis users should be exempt, she said.

Belleville, Ont., resident and medicinal cannabis activist Nate Oxford, who prefers to use a different last name to protect his identity, is also pleased with the election results. He uses cannabis to treat fibromyalgia, a spinal injury and post-traumatic stress disorder.

"We give people licences to drive vehicles, which can turn into very dangerous objects," he said. "This is, on a scale of dangerous things, very mild."

There are fewer than 40,000 Canadian medical marijuana patients, but the University of Ottawa estimates there are some 2.3 million recreational pot users.

Trudeau win bodes well for provinces, premier says

New Brunswick Premier Brian Gallant is congratulating Justin Trudeau for his historic majority election win and says it's important to have a government in Ottawa that wants to work with the provinces.

The Liberal premier says in order to overcome the challenges facing the country and to seize opportunities, the various levels of government need to work together.

"He wants to work with us and that's all we can ask. As long as we have someone who sincerely wants to do what they can to help New Brunswick and help the whole country from coast to coast to coast, that's a great starting point," Gallant said.

Premiers often criticized Prime Minister Stephen Harper for refusing to meet with them as a group.

Gallant said he's pleased Trudeau shares the view that there's a need to invest now to improve infrastructure and create jobs.

"Now is the time to invest to ensure we are sparking growth, to ensure we're creating jobs in the short term and that we have the infrastructure to be prosperous in the long term."

All 10 of New Brunswick's federal ridings went Liberal in Monday's election.

While Gallant has been a big proponent of the proposed Energy East pipeline, he said he agrees with Trudeau that there must be an exhaustive process to ensure it is viable and safe. THE CANADIAN PRESS

Parts flying off wind turbines: Report

Conservatives demand safety audits across entire province

The Progressive Conservatives are demanding a safety audit of all industrial wind turbines in Ontario, after reports of sensors flying off some of the huge blades.

Tory environment critic Lisa Thompson says farmers in Bluewater near Sarnia are being advised not to harvest crops near the giant turbines until they notify the wind farm owners so the blades can be slowed down.

The Bluewater municipal council has asked its staff to investigate the reports, and Thompson wants the province to look into the situation as well.

Environment Minister Glen Murray says wind power is among the safest forms of energy technology.

He insists it would be premature to suggest there's a problem.

NextEra Energy Canada did not immediately respond to requests for comment about the potential safety threat from sensors coming off the giant wind turbines or say how big the devices actually are.

Murray dismissed Thompson's call for a safety audit of industrial wind turbines, but says he takes the reports of parts flying off very seriously, and his ministry will look into the complaints to see exactly what is happening.

"There are sometimes issues with every form of energy and we always send out inspectors," he said.

where people have attributed things to wind turbines that were in fact not to be the case."

JURISDICTION

New court ruling for immigrant detainees

Ontario's top court has opened an avenue for long-term detainees from abroad to challenge the legality of their detentions in Superior Court rather than through the immigration process and Federal Court.

In its ruling Tuesday, the Court of Appeal made it clear the idea wasn't to have the courts interfere in immigration decisions.

"The Federal Court has greater expertise in immigration matters than the superior courts and that, in such matters, a Superior Court should ... defer to the Federal Court," the Appeal Court ruled.

"The issues raised by the appellants, however, are fundamentally detention decisions."

The case involved four foreigners kept behind bars pending deportation or extradition, for periods ranging from two years to more than eight years. They argued their detention had become illegal because of its length and the uncertainty of its duration.

In March, Superior Court Justice Kenneth Campbell ruled he had no jurisdiction to hear the case. Their sole recourse under case law dating to 1989, Campbell ruled, was through the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, which says reviews must go through Federal Court.

The four appealed, arguing the 1989 ruling did not apply because their detention appeared to be indefinite. The only issue on appeal was whether they did indeed have a right to turn to Superior Court for relief.

ANNIVERSARY

Ceremony to be held in honour of shooting victims

Members of the public are invited to attend a ceremony at the National War Memorial on Thursday to commemorate the anniversary of last year's Ottawa shootings.

The 11 a.m. ceremony will remember Cpl. Nathan Cirillo, who was shot while standing sentry at the War Memorial last Oct. 22, as well as Warrant Officer Patrice Vincent, who was killed in Montreal days before. The event will also commemorate the first responders.

Gov.-Gen. David Johnston will deliver an address at the ceremony, and other dignitaries will lay wreaths.

A 21-gun salute will be fired from Parliament Hill around 11 a.m., and Royal Canadian Air Force CF-18 will do a flyby over the War Memorial at 11:20 a.m.

Last Oct. 22, Michael Zehaf Bibeau shot Cirillo and then stormed Parliament Hill's Centre Block before he was shot.

Ron James heads for the Hill for laughs

Haley Ritchie
Metro | Ottawa

Canadian comic Ron James is coming to Ottawa with some new material next month.

Even if the new government becomes a target, he's confident they'll be able to laugh along with him.

"I'm so happy. The dark reign of Mordor is done," he said Tuesday, noting that the red tide started on the East Coast, including his home province of Nova Scotia.

James performs at Centrepointhe Theatre Nov. 12, as part of a coast-to-coast tour.

While much of his comedy focuses on the Canadian experience and struggles with technology, there's always room for some political digs.

But James doesn't consider himself a partisan — a recent show in Brockville, Ont., sold out, despite tensions running high between Conservatives, NDP supporters and Liberals.

"For two-and-a-half hours I had everybody on the same page," he said. "That's what it's about."

Word to future politicians: You don't get far with a jokester if you can't laugh at yourself.

"As far as a comedian is concerned, I can get back to normal. If you make fun of the Liberals, they'll laugh along with you. You make fun of these Conservatives, they're dragging the river for you the next day," he said. "These guys could not take a joke."

Fortunately for James, the rest of Canada can. Tickets start at $51.25 and are already selling fast.

Student union wants bottled water ban

After four years of banning the bottle, Carleton University's student association is considering bringing bottled water back to student businesses.

The student union stopped selling bottled water in 2011 as an environmental policy, encouraged by a nationwide student movement.

Yet other food contractors on campus continued selling bottled water, and that's the heart of the problem, says CUSA vice-president Craig Handy.

"Students come in (to our businesses) asking for bottled water — it's a constant occurrence," he said. "People who want to buy water bottles still buy water bottles, despite the water refill stations that are there," he said. "It's not benefiting anybody," he added. Handy introduced a motion to bring bottled water back on Monday, but he said it was more to determine whether the issue was important to students. After a debate, it was decided the motion would go back to discussion, to see what can be done to motivate a campus-wide ban and find a lasting solution. "This motion has re-sparked a conversation," said Handy. "We can talk about how we can take the battle up and get the bottles removed entirely."

Several schools across Canada have banned water bottles, including the University of Ottawa in 2011. Queen's University also phased out bottled water with food contractors and is now bottled-water free. Handy said he wants the same thing happen at Carleton, but the policy is in "limbo."

INTERNATIONAL OPINION

The world reacts to Liberals' victory

The first foreign reactions to Justin Trudeau's ascent to the prime ministership included words of both congratulation and consternation — as well as some sexual objectification.

The flood of well-wishes began early Tuesday as world leaders from India, Mexico, Italy, France, China, the U.K. and the U.S. either sent messages or called Canada's newest prime minister-designate.

The foreign media coverage included serious dives into his policies. At the same time there was a bumper crop of tabloid-style headlines about his appearance, with the UK Daily Mirror offering one example of the genre: "Is Justin Trudeau the sexiest politician in the world?"

Sexy or not, his closest international partner showed no sign of being an easy first date. The U.S. sent mixed signals Tuesday, some of encouragement but also notes of caution.

The White House offered congratulations and welcomed talk of closer co-operation on climate change. On the other hand, the Obama administration sought clarity on two files where it was pleased with the relationship with the Conservative government: trade and the military.

A White House spokesman raised the Islamic State bombing mission without prompting Tuesday. There were whispers in Washington over the summer that the administration was concerned about the Liberals' stated intention of withdrawing from the bombing, in order to contribute in other ways.

Leader's good looks could be good for country

Luke Simcoe
Metro | Toronto

Within hours of Justin Trudeau's election Monday night, news outlets around the world were remarking on Canada's "hot" and "sexy" new leader.

While Trudeau's square jaw and headline-grabbing hair may not end poverty or reduce Canada's greenhouse gas emissions, branding experts say the prime minister-elect's good looks could have real benefits for the country's reputation.

"The thing that's exciting about Justin is that he brings Canada's brand for the first time into the 21st century," said Bruce Mau Design CEO Hunter Tura. "He's a J.F.K.-like figure. He's got the vitality, the good looks, the beautiful family."

"To have the country represented on the global stage by someone with such charisma is great for brand Canada."

Michèle Champagne, a Toronto writer and designer with a background in global branding, said Trudeau's image could potentially boost immigration and stem the country's "creative brain drain."

"I think the world will see him as this fresh, leftist face," she said. "Does that mean Canada will be a place where more young people want to emigrate? Will it attract more artists and designers to Canada? I don't know."

While he'd prefer to see Canadians discussing policy rather than appearances, Memorial University professor Alex Marland acknowledged the appeal of a popular prime minister.

"The very fact that we're having this conversation shows how much of Canada's identity is wrapped up in its leader," he said. "You look to that to embody everything about our nation."

From a branding perspective, Marland said there are significant differences between Trudeau and Harper.

"I'd say we've gone from policy wonk to young optimism," he said. "And while Harper represented individuals, Trudeau portrays a sense of communitarianism."

Regardless, Marland cautioned against falling into a Trudeau-mania 2.0.

"Any charismatic leader brings a sense of excitement and pride, but it can also cause people to look the other way," he said. "Too often, we're willing to give a politician the benefit of the doubt because they're likable."

FAMILY

First Canadian political dynasty

It seems somehow fitting that the son of the man who first fired up political passion in Stephen Harper should be the person to usher him out of politics.

In besting Harper, Justin Trudeau has created Canada's first national political dynasty, following in the footsteps of his late father, Pierre Trudeau, one of the country's most revered — and reviled — prime ministers.

In the process, he's scored another record for the history books, vaulting his party from a distant third place into first in a single election. And now he'll be the first prime minister to return to the home where he grew up, 24 Sussex Drive. THE CANADIAN PRESS

I'm hopeful tonight's election will put Canada back in a leadership position. Congratulations.

Party insiders laying blame on campaign manager

On his final campaign flight from Abbotsford, B.C., to Calgary, Stephen Harper sat with his closest friends and began putting together the plan for his exit from the Conservative party leadership.

That plan began unfolding Tuesday as Conservative politicians and the party's rank-and-file look to a future leadership race in order to move forward and rebuild from a devastating election loss.

She had four years to prepare for this campaign and was simply wholly unprepared.

Conservative source

Harper was calm about the defeat that lay before him, according to sources who spoke to The Canadian Press over the past 24 hours. During the flight, he sat alternately with longtime aide Ray Novak and party president John Walsh.

In the days to come, the structure of the upcoming leadership race will take shape. Senior parliamentarians Diane Finley, Tony Clement and Rob Nicholson are among the names being floated for interim leader.

At the same time as the leadership race is set in motion, the activists are in the process of raking through the embers of the campaign, analyzing what went wrong and who is to blame.

The party's executive director, Dustin van Vugt, is in charge of a process to review the campaign.

A senior party source said the party will be in debt as a result of the election campaign, something the members aren't used to. Considerable anger is being directed at campaign manager Jenni Byrne.

A high-placed Conservative source with intimate knowledge of the campaign argued that Harper personally performed well, and the leader's tour ran efficiently, but everything else was “an epic failure.”

“While it's ultimately the prime minister's fault because he allowed Jenni to have that role, it is inexcusable that she had four years to prepare for this campaign and was simply wholly unprepared,” said the source, speaking on condition of anonymity. “When the party conducts its internal review, over the course of the next number of months, this one is going to be very thorough and we're going to identify the mistakes that were made, the processes that weren't followed.”

In a sign of how tense things had become, Byrne was packing up her office in the Ottawa party war room as early as last Thursday. She was not in Calgary on election night, and was out of the job Tuesday morning.

NDP stunned after dreams of governing shattered

The soul-searching is starting among members of the NDP after the stunning collapse of their vote in the federal election.

Party insiders say they saw the electoral freight train that was Justin Trudeau's campaign coming down the tracks as much as a month ago, but many in the senior leadership refused to believe it. Even still, the insiders say the scope of the loss and the prospect of a long rebuilding process are just beginning to sink in.

Some of the party's brightest public lights have been extinguished. High-profile MPs lost their seats.

The question on the minds of many people outside the party is whether leader Tom Mulcair will stay to lead a smaller caucus, especially when some in the party have questioned whether he dragged the NDP too far to the centre.

Robin Sears, who once served as the NDP's national director, says the party is not inclined to turf leaders.

OPINION

If your party didn't win, be thankful it was a peaceful loss

Gilbert Ngabo
Metro | Toronto

I didn't vote on Monday. I can't tell you how sad that made me feel.

Forget about all the rhetoric of civic duty, the grudge you hold against this or that leader. Or political party. Or the talk about making your voice count.

All of that stuff matters. But what I was longing for was to participate in a democratic process that is peaceful, in every sense of the word.

As I mingled in a crowd of Liberal MP-elect Marco Mendicino's supporters, my mind couldn't stop rambling about what elections mean in different parts of the world.

Take Kenya, 2007. Following the highly contested presidential elections, a dispute over the results erupted. People started attacking each other, and thousands lost their lives in the mayhem.

See, for some people it doesn't really matter who wins the most votes. As long as a preferred candidate doesn't win, the system is flawed. And in extreme instances, that means killings, fleeing and refugee life.

I've only voted twice in my life, in the Rwandan presidential elections held in 2003 and 2010. Despite trying to convince myself that my vote actually counted on both occasions, observers from the European Commission, African Union and a gazillion rights organizations reported on serious voting irregularities.

I knew Stephen Harper wasn't going to call in military forces in an attempt to cling to power.

You want to think they're not right, but still you question the validity of your vote. After all, vote rigging does happen.

Not in Canada, apparently. All along, I wasn't expecting NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair to come out and start accusing incoming prime minister Justin Trudeau of stealing the votes.

I knew Stephen Harper wasn't going to call in military forces in an attempt to cling to power.

But watching them deliver concession speeches, all smiles, almost brought me to tears. The same three guys who had spent the last 78 days tearing each other down by any and all available means were now all of a sudden extolling each other and the electoral process.

Harper's words were more poignant. It's still unreal for me to hear an incumbent and powerful leader admit that the people are never wrong, notwithstanding that they just turfed him out.

So as winners congratulated losers on a well-run campaign, I couldn't have asked for a more powerful way to show the value of a vote.

And I felt sad that, as a permanent resident, I couldn't cast a ballot that was peaceful — in every sense of the word.

POLICY

Major fiscal changes expected under Liberal leadership

Most tax changes are announced in federal budgets, which are usually introduced in the late winter or early spring. ISTOCK

From tax cuts on middle incomes to an expanded Canada Pension Plan, the Liberals made a lot of promises during the federal election campaign that would affect Canadians' finances.

Now that the Liberals have won a majority under leader Justin Trudeau, Canadians can expect to see major changes in federal fiscal policy.

That includes undoing some of the targeted goodies the Conservatives created — such as an expanded TFSA — in favour of making broader tax cuts and benefits.

How soon might Canadians see these changes?

In theory, “a government can introduce anything at any time when they're in a majority,” said Brian Brophy, tax partner at Deloitte.

Plans to roll back TFSA contribution limits to $5,500 from $10,000 could be introduced as soon as Parliament resumes sitting, for example.

But, in practice, most major tax changes are announced in federal budgets, which are usually introduced in the late winter or early spring.

Some Liberal campaign promises, such as an expanded Canada Pension Plan, could take longer, as they require the support of seven out of 10 provinces representing two-thirds of the population.

How will the proposed tax changes affect families?

The impact of the Liberal's proposed tax changes on individual families will depend on specific financial circumstances, said Caroline Battista, a senior tax analyst with H&R Block.

Even higher-income families will benefit from the tax cut on middle incomes, while some lower-income families could lose in the decision to end income splitting, she said.

She urges people to look beyond political rhetoric before assuming they don't qualify for certain benefits.

“One of the things about our system is that it's unique to the individual, based in their allowable deductions and qualifying tax credits,” she said.

Thousands of migrants overwhelming Slovenia

CRISIS

Country 'in dire straits,' needs more help from EU, official says

Led by riot police on horseback, thousands of weary migrants marched across western Balkans borderlands as far as the eye could see Tuesday as authorities cautiously lowered barriers and intensified efforts to cope with a human tide unseen in Europe since World War II.

Leaders of Slovenia deployed military units to support police on their overwhelmed southern border with Croatia, which delivered more than 6,000 asylum seekers by train and bus to the frontier in bitterly disputed circumstances between the former Yugoslav rivals.

With far too few buses available in Slovenia to cope, most people walked 15 kilometres on rural lanes past cornfields and pastures to reach a refugee camp.

On Slovenia's frontiers with Croatia and Austria, aid workers toiled to erect enough tents and other emergency accommodation to shelter up to 14,000 travellers, more than five times the tiny nation's previous official limit.

Interior Secretary of State

Bostjan Sefic told reporters in the Slovene capital, Ljubljana, that the pressure on border security with Croatia had grown "very difficult with an enormous number of people." He said Slovenia, an Alpine land of barely two million, needed much more help immediately from bigger EU partners to cope or the country might have to adopt border-toughening measures.

"If this continues we will have extreme problems. Slovenia is already in dire straits, an impossible situation," Sefic said.

In Brussels, Slovenian President Borut Pahor met European Union leaders and said he expected his country to apply for emergency financial aid and border patrol reinforcements from EU partners.

Hungary, long the most popular eastern gateway for people fleeing conflict and poverty in the Middle East, Asia and Africa, has padlocked its borders for migrants progressively over the past month, forcing the tide west through Croatia and Slovenia.

All three nations have expressed fears of ending up stuck accommodating tens of thousands of asylum-seekers indefinitely if other EU nations farther north close their borders too. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UN official visits Jerusalem calling for end to violence

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon called for calm during a surprise visit to Jerusalem on Tuesday ahead of meetings with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, in a high-profile gambit to bring an end to a month-long wave of violence.

The visit comes amid unrest that erupted a month ago over tensions surrounding Jerusalem's most sensitive holy site.

A spate of almost daily Palestinian attacks against civilians and soldiers, most of which have involved stabbings, has caused panic across Israel.

for Israelis and Palestinians. I am here in the hope that we can work together to end the violence, ease the tensions and begin to restore a long term political horizon of peace," Ban said at a press conference with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"I deplore the random attacks against civilians. Such terror attacks make every place unsafe and every person regardless of gender or age a potential victim," he said.

Over the past month, 10 Israelis have been killed in Palestinian attacks most of them stabbings. In that time, 46 Palestinians were killed by Israeli fire. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

THE QUESTION
I don't wish to tell my wife's parents they're overstaying their welcome, but they really are. They have been here for nearly a month. I am starting to hate them. HELP ME ELLEN.

Dear Ellen,

I was wondering what you recommend when it comes to appropriately telling someone that you hate what they are doing and wish that they would change it this instant. I don't wish to tell these people (as they are guests that they are overstaying their welcome, but they really are. They have been here for nearly a MONTH now, and I am starting to hate them (they are my wife's parents). I really like them, but I need some space.

HELP ME ELLEN! Or I might go crazy!!!!

Apollo

Dear Apollo,

Your question raises many more questions, starting with: How badly do you want to stay married?

Where is your wife in all this? Is it the case that her parents are driving her crazy too, but she's incapable of confronting them and therefore is relying on you, her champion and protector, to get rid of this invading in-law horde of two? If so, you may safely, and politely, use the standard breakup strategy learned in your dating years.

Take them out for a nice dinner in a public place where they (hopefully) won't freak out when you dump them. Tell them it's you, not them. You're under a lot of stress (imply it's work, not their overbearing demands for constant contact, even though it is), and it's driving you crazy that you can't give them the love and attention they so obviously deserve. Pacify them with promises that you still want them to stay over again from time to time (with firmly set parameters), because you really do love them and want them in your life, but only if they can accept what you're capable of giving.

Although this may sound like the bogus crap used by jilting cowards when they're tired of a too-devoted sex partner (or so I've, um, heard), the fact that you (judging by your letter) really feel this way about your in-laws makes it respectfully honest, even though it may be difficult for you to say and for them to hear.

If, on the other hand, your wife loves having her parents stay with you and never wants them to leave, you're in trouble. You then have to have a respectful, honest conversation with your wife, and of course we hope you'll follow the rules of proper etiquette there too, or at least the rules of the Geneva Conventions.

Finally, if the direct approach with either party fails, you may have to gracefully let go and put your attention elsewhere. And no, Apollo, we do not mean polishing the stair boards leading up to the guest room to a slippery glass-like surface and then plying the in-laws with brandy after dinner. That approach is tantamount to murder, and murder, while sometimes understandable, is never polite.

Take them out for a nice dinner in a public place where they (hopefully) won't freak out when you dump them.

We're thinking more along the lines of, say, that drum kit you've been eyeing since high school. Honestly, after all your self-sacrifice, don't you owe it to yourself to bring it home and finally learn how to play? Or that kitchen reno your wife's been dreaming of — why not purchase a brand-new sledgehammer and do the preliminary demolition yourself to save money? Or, as long as your home is open for extended stays from in-laws, go ahead and invite that poor, neglected uncle of yours — you know, the tone-deaf one who insists on singing along with every contestant on The Voice whether he knows the words or not, while his Doritos-addicted spouse hogs the entire couch because her severe flatulence prevents her from sitting up straight.

It may feel as if you're cutting off your nose to spite your face, but stick with it. Someday you'll be a happy percussionist with a new kitchen who's brought joy to a weird uncle and his digestively challenged wife, and thereby reclaimed his home for himself and — we hope — his wife.

Need advice?

Perhaps someday we'll see a historic election for women. Not this time.

Shocking. Stunning. Historic. A triumph.

The Liberal victory is being called many things — but while it's a reversal of fortune for the country, it's hardly transformative for women in Parliament. Forget "real change"; try status quo.

The number of female MPs rose slightly Monday night, from 76 elected in 2011 to the new total of 88. But given the growth in overall MPs, it's only a tiny jump in women's percentage of seats — from 25 per cent to 26 per cent.

An increase I'd generously call peanuts.

The organization dedicated to increasing the number of women in elected office said as much yesterday. Equal Voice vice-president Joan Weinman said that we at least didn't slide backward, but that "quite honestly, when half the population is women, it would be really nice to see a number that somewhat reflected that in the House of Commons."

Such is the state of politics and feminism that parties can rise and fall with the hard swing of the electoral boom, while women's influence stagnates.

Still, all progress is progress. And the Liberals have promised much for women, including a commitment to the right to abortion and promises to fight violence against women, open more women's shelters and make child care more affordable for those who need it. Crucially, the party hung its hat on a guarantee to name a half-women cabinet, and Justin Trudeau has some high-powered women to choose from, including Chrystia Freeland and Jody Wilson-Raybould, who represents one of 10 indigenous Canadians voted in — another record broken.

When Chatelaine mused in 2014 whether Justin Trudeau was "the candidate women have been waiting for," it noted he "could be a game changer, hauling so-called 'women's issues' into the 21st century."

He may indeed.

"We woke up this morning, and Canada had just elected a self-declared feminist as a prime minister," said Kelly Bowden, spokeswoman for the Up for Debate campaign, suggesting Trudeau will take women's issues seriously.

Meanwhile, Equal Voice is already working toward the next election, planning to recruit and train 5,000 women across the country to run for office (about 500 ran this time around).

I remain skeptical that any election can give to women MPs the kind of dramatic boost that the Liberals at large were given this week, but Weinman disagrees.

"I say to you: Hell yes, it is absolutely possible."

Perhaps she's right. Perhaps we will see, one day, a historic election for women.

RECIPE EXCERPT MAGGIE BATTISTA'S FOOD GIFT LOVE

Candied Blood Orange Rinds

Makes: About 250 strips or about 1 1/2 pounds

Preparation Time: About 3 hours passive time (up to 12 hours total time)

The French understand how to preserve citrus with such elegance and after tasting so many versions of candied rind, in particular, in France, I committed to creating my own recipe. This works just beautifully with oranges and grapefruit, but these Candied Blood Orange Rinds have become one of my signature food gifts. Making them is time intensive but has also honed my multi-tasking skills.

INGREDIENTS

- 5 blood oranges
- 2 cups granulated sugar, plus more for dredging
- 1 1/2 cups water

SPECIAL EQUIPMENT

- Drying rack or parchment paper

1. With a sharp knife, score the peel of the blood oranges into four big wedges. Peel the thick skin wedges away from the fruit, discarding any loose pith fibers. Set the skin aside.

2. Slice the blood oranges in half and juice them with a hand juicer. I get about 1 cup of juice; reserve 1/2 cup for this recipe and store the remaining 1/2 cup for another use (like Blood Orange Mimosas).

3. Slice the orange rinds into strips 1/8-inch and 1/4-inch wide. My knives are very sharp which makes it easy for me to get the 1/8-inch slice, but a 1/4-inch slice is good, too. If the blood orange peel has a very thick white pith, trim a touch of the white pith away and discard. Do not trim too much, as the pith is what retains the sweetness once candied.

4. Place the rinds in a pot and fill with enough cold water to cover by an inch. (If you're unsure of how to quantify the water, place the orange rinds in the pot and hold some down with a small measuring cup with a clean ruler placed inside. Add enough water to come up 1 inch on the ruler. Remove the measuring cup and ruler before beginning to cook.) Bring to a boil and then boil for 3 minutes. Drain.

5. Repeat this process 3 more times. Boiling the rinds several times helps to remove extra bitterness. On the last drain, put the fruit aside for a moment.

6. In a clean pot, add the sugar, water and reserved 1/2 cup blood orange juice. Bring to a boil and then add the rinds. Return to a boil over high heat and then reduce the heat to medium. Cook the rinds for 45 minutes, or until the syrup is very thick and the rinds are barely translucent. Do not stir the pot; just keep swirling the liquid in the pot in order to keep the rinds fully submerged. If you smell any sign of burning, immediately lower the heat and swirl, swirl, swirl.

7. When ready, remove the rinds from the syrup (a few at a time) with tongs and dry them on a rack or a simple piece of parchment paper, making sure to not let them touch each other (they'll stick!) Let them dry for 4 to 6 hours or overnight. If they are still a bit wet, let them dry a little longer. (They will always be just a bit sticky.)

8. When dry, dredge the rinds through sugar. I prefer organic granulated sugar, as the color is a bit more translucent and the rind colour shines through, but traditional white granulated sugar is fine, too. You may need to press the sugar up against the rinds to ensure that it sticks well. Alternatively, if you plan to use the rinds in a baked good, omit the sugar altogether.

9. Store in an airtight container at room temperature for up to 4 weeks or in the fridge for up to 3 months.

GIFT WRAP

Gift wrap supplies: Paper bags, crimping shears, tag, wax paper

Optional: Rubber band, twine

Crimp bags to desired height and fill them with rinds. Write or stamp your label on a tag. With a hole puncher, make a hole through the top of the bag and the top of the tag. Thread a round head paper fastener through the tag and through the bag. Bend the fastener into place.

Decadent Peanut Butter Balls

Makes: 60 to 70 tiny balls

Preparation Time: up to 3 hours

INGREDIENTS

- 3/4 cup confectioners' sugar
- 1 cup peanut butter
- 3 tablespoons (1 1/2 ounce) unsalted butter, melted
- 1 cup rice cereal
- 2 cups milk chocolate chips

SPECIAL EQUIPMENT

- Double boiler

1. Line a small baking sheet with parchment paper. Set aside. Add sugar, peanut butter and butter to a bowl. Mix to combine well — until no trace of confectioners' sugar remains in the bowl.

2. Add rice cereal and mix to combine well — it's easiest to combine with your clean hands. With a measuring spoon or small scooper, form small balls the size of about 1 tsp. Use your hands to pinch, press and roll each into a little ball and place on cookie sheet.

3. When all the mixture has been formed into balls, place the baking sheet in the fridge overnight or in the freezer for 30 minutes to chill and harden.

4. When ready to coat your peanut butter balls with chocolate, prepare the double boiler. Set a double boiler over medium heat. Place a bit of water in the bottom pot making sure the water doesn't touch the underside of the top pot. Assemble the double boiler. If you don't have a double boiler, place a metal or glass bowl on top of a medium pot.

5. Place the chocolate into the top part of a double boiler to melt until a smooth consistency. You may opt to temper the chocolate instead. If you plan to temper the chocolate, reserve half the chocolate for the tempering part of the process.

6. Roll each ball in the melted chocolate and return to the baking sheet. Chill in the fridge for at least 2 hours until hard. They will keep in an airtight container in the fridge for up to 2 weeks.

Gift Wrap
Add balls to small bowls. Cut a long length of ribbon and tie in a knot around the bowl.

Ask any Canadian what a double double is and you'll get a description of a sweet, creamy coffee that Canucks "always have time for."

Although the double double — coffee with two creams and two sugars — isn't technically on the Tim Hortons menu, it's become synonymous with the brand.

We couldn't resist making a nighttime counterpart to the popular coffee order. We initially envisioned an equal-parts drink — two shots whisky and two shots Kahlúa — but we realized it's just not a double double without all that creamy goodness, so we incorporated whisky cream liqueur.

The Double Double

- 1 1/2 oz Canadian whisky, such as Forty Creek Barrel Select
- 3/4 oz Kahlúa

- 3/4 oz Forty Creek Cream Liqueur
- 1 dash Angostura bitters
- Handful of ice cubes
- Small pinch finely ground espresso, for garnish

Serving suggestions
Sprinkle with espresso and serve with a stir stick

Pour all ingredients except ice and espresso into a mixing glass.

Add ice and stir until chilled. Strain through a julep strainer into a chilled mug or glass.

Sprinkle with espresso to garnish. Serve with a coffee stir stick, if you like.

Madhur Jaffrey is known to Americans — when she is known at all — as an author of Indian cookbooks. And with good reason: she has written more than two dozen of them.

But that's just the start. The woman often called "the Julia Child of Indian cookery" was born in Delhi, India, and came to the United States in the late 1950s, eventually landing among the New York glitterati. She started her career as an actress — something she continues to do — but soon found herself deeply rooted in the world of food. She has hosted cooking shows both here and in Britain, and helped launch the renowned New York Indian restaurant Dawat.

Now 82, her newest book, Vegetarian India: A Journey Through the Best of Indian Home Cooking, will be released in October. Here she talks about her acting, her start in food, and her pivotal friendship with filmmakers Ismail Merchant and James Ivory.

What was the impetus for Vegetarian India? Why this book and why now?

I've never done a book that's all Indian and all vegetarian. There are many areas of India that I don't know and many cuisines I don't know, and I thought this would be a good way to learn about the cuisines I don't know anything about.

When you came to the U.S. in the late 1950s, you landed first in Vermont, where you taught pantomime, correct? How did that happen?

I needed a job. I was in the theatre and was very kindly employed by the Catholic University theatre team. They said "Why don't you come in the summer and work with our summer stock company," which used to live in Winooski, Vermont.

And from there you went to New York City. What were you hoping to find there?

The theatre brought me to New York. (My first husband) Saeed (Jaffrey) also studied at Catholic. He graduated and came to New York and I came with him. I was working as a guide at the UN at the time, and doing theatre in the Village. We were doing off-Broadway. The way I could stay was to have a visa by working at the UN. Then I could do theatre, for which I was earning something like $10 a week.

I imagine the Indian community in New York was very small at that time. Did everyone know each other?

All those (Indians) who came were doctors and statisticians and engineers. America wasn't taking people who weren't these things because that wasn't what was needed. We were very rare, these people in the arts. We knew all the people in the arts because that's where our interest lay. We knew the Indians who were around and other people who were actors but weren't Indians. It was an intellectual bookish, artish world.

Were you fully embraced by the non-Indian art scene?

As curiosities, yes. But as somebody to give work to, no. It was very hard to get work. That's why we needed other jobs, all of us. I am in the art world; I have one daughter who's an actress, one who is a writer. The actress daughter has the same problem I did. But she is two steps ahead. Indians now are more in shows. People are writing more parts for Indians and they can play non-Indians. In House of Cards, my daughter played a Latino. (In my time) we were just Indians, and they were always the shiek-y types.

What do you make of Mindy Kaling and Aziz Ansari and Indians on Pizza Hut commercials?

It's changing. This new generation is getting much more work. My daughter's generation and her friends — all of these people you mention — she knows all these people because they've all been at it together for a long time.

HOME COOKING

Rice up your life

Theresa Albert

For Metro Canada

Canadians are learning that healthy and tasty can coexist when they take a bite out of the world around them. Rice is a practical grain that goes with everything and is a healthier option than many other starches like nutrition-robbed peeled and boiled potatoes.

According to a study published in Food and Nutrition Sciences, rice consumption was associated with better diet quality and general nutrient intake.

Here are some cool facts about rice to spout at the water cooler:

- Contrary to common thinking, rice can be reheated. Cool and store covered in the fridge for up to a week or freezer up to 6 weeks. Homemade "minute rice" simply needs 2 Tbsp of liquid per cup of rice added before warming it up in a microwave or on the stovetop.

- Canada doesn't grow rice, meaning US-grown rice is as local as it gets. Nearly 70 per cent of our rice is from south of the border.

- One seed of rice yields more than 3,000 grains. It is the highest yielding cereal grain and can grow in many kinds of soils. This hits all the right notes for our sustainability quest.

- About 50 per cent of North Americans consume only half of the magnesium they should. Magnesium is critical for muscle function. There is more magnesium in 1 cup of cooked long grain brown rice (21 per cent DV) than in 3.5 cups of spinach (20 per cent DV), and it has 4 g of fibre.

LIQUID ASSETS

Chenin for a change

No matter how you try and drink your way around it, falling into a grape rut, where you keep returning to the same varieties, happens to even the most seasoned wine fans.

While in South Africa last month I rediscovered Chenin Blanc. Though popular in the vineyards surrounding Cape Town, and those in its original home in France's Loire Valley, this arguably second-tier grape often takes a backseat to Chardonnay and Sauvignon Blanc.

Typically acidic, the versions produced in South Africa play up the grape's soft, plush fruit which turns it into a versatile white wine that marries well with a wide variety of foods.

While I don't usually suggest trying a value-priced wine when trying to get your palate around a new grape (they rarely show its true personality) KVV's Contemporary Collection 2014 Chenin Blanc ($9.45-$10.99) is an impressive take on Chenin. Dry, with balanced acidity, it offers a creamy mouthfeel of lime and green fruit that would work particularly well with anything spicy.

Good on paper, better on the road

REVIEW

Cadillac CTS boasts angular beauty and potent chassis

Mike Goetz

For Metro Canada

The original Cadillac CTS debuted in 2002 to herald the brand's new "Art and Science" design direction. It showed Cadillac was serious about moving away from its traditional luxury role of providing big and cushy American iron, to one that took on the premium German brands at their own sporty, high-tech games.

It's a plan that has more or less worked; sales are definitely up at Cadillac, but models still chase their respective rivals. In the case of the midsize CTS, that means it is still operating in the shadow of those class-conquering BMW 5 Series and Mercedes-Benz E-Class models, both of which are the very definition of a moving target.

The current-generation CTS, which debuted in 2014, is a bit of a curious animal. It seems to have aced the hardest parts of matching up with its premium competition, namely beautiful and distinctive styling, and a chassis that is the measure of anything in its class for on-road competence and enjoyment. The more mundane aspects of this vehicle seem to let it down.

But let's first go over more of the good stuff ...

The new RWD-based architecture features judicious use of aluminum and magnesium, making the CTS one of the lighter cars in its class.

Slide into the interior and you'll be enveloped by a multitude of textures and finishes.

Our test vehicle had the optional 3.6-litre V6, which is all new this year. Rated at 335 hp and 284 lb-ft of torque, it is part of Cadillac's new engine family, and features heady technology such as automatic stop/start, direct injection with integrated exhaust manifolds, rigid aluminum block, and a cylinder deactivation system, which shuts down only one cylinder on each bank.

Net result is a very powerful, quiet and efficient V6. Combined with the new 8-speed automatic transmission, you have a totally up-to-date powertrain, and another reason why this Cadillac is so satisfying to drive.

Now a few gripes ...

The back seats are a bit tight for a luxury car of this size.

There are almost too many different types of materials and surfaces at play in the interior. Feels too busy to be sophisticated and calming.

Pricing has gotten steeper, especially when you start loading up on the available high tech. Cadillac is revisiting this issue, however, with special pricing programs.

The CUE driver interface continues to drag down the enjoyment of this car. With everything controlled by a touchscreen that is not super-fast-reacting, your eyes are constantly going back and forth from the screen to the road, which can contribute to a bit of needless nervousness behind the wheel.

DRIVING FORCE

In-wheel electric motors could improve the way we drive

Jill McIntosh
For Metro Canada

Despite all our advances in automotive technology, most vehicles basically work the same way as they have for more than a century. Power comes from a gasoline engine or electric motor, depending on the type of vehicle, and the energy it creates is transferred through drive shafts to the wheels.

While the technology is still largely experimental, some companies are now looking at in-wheel electric motors. As the name suggests, each wheel contains an individual electric motor that exclusively turns it. Instead of a connected system of drive shafts that transfers the engine's power to the wheels, each of the vehicle's four in-wheel motors works independently, connected only by wires to the vehicle's battery for their power, and to the computer that controls the system.

Although each motor turns by itself, the control system has to be extremely sophisticated for everything to work together. In addition to all four motors turning at the same speed when driving straight ahead, they must also stop simultaneously if the vehicle is going to brake in a straight line, and be able to co-ordinate their individual speeds when the driver wants to turn.

In-wheel systems would eliminate a number of vehicle components, including those that need occasional maintenance or replacement, such as brake pads. However, they would also need to be programmed to perform the functions of government-mandated safety systems such as anti-lock brakes, which rapidly apply and release the brakes to prevent locking up in panic stops, and electronic stability control, which applies the brakes to individual wheels to correct a skid.

Without the need for drive shafts, the vehicle's floor could be lower and completely flat, making it easier to get in and out, and providing more passenger and cargo space inside. And since the wheels have much more movement, a driver could

+ THE PHYSICS

- Because electric motors don't have to rev up like gasoline engines do, vehicles that use them are capable of very quick acceleration.

pull up beside a parallel parking space, turn the wheels all the way, and just slide the car sideways into the spot.

But before vehicles with in-wheel motors become commonplace, there are still issues to overcome. Although there have been a few higher-speed prototypes, most of the work has been done on small, lower-speed city commuter cars. While the motors eliminate the weight and complexity of driveshaft systems, engineers will have to determine how their extra mass at the wheels will affect driving and handling. The motors will also have to be extra robust to handle potholes and bumps, as well as snow and road salt, if they're ever going to handle most of our Canadian roads.

Older Civics still a model of reliability

USED VEHICLE

Check on modifications in 2011-2015 models

In 2010, the latest-generation Civic hit the road for model-year 2011 with numerous updates and enhancements. Canadian-built and highly recognized as one of the smartest choices in its segment, the 2011 Civic carried forward with an award-winning reputation for reliability, durability, residual values, fuel efficiency and safety.

Look for sedan or coupe models in the used market, with the sporty Civic Si topping the model range, and LX or EX grades coming in as basic or mid-line, respectively.

Standard four-cylinder engines make 140 horsepower and come with a five-speed manual or five-speed automatic transmission. The high-performance Civic Si, available in coupe or sedan, gets a 200-horsepower, high-revving 2.4-litre engine and six-speed manual backed by various chassis and cosmetic tweaks.

The test drive

Put the car into a high gear at a low speed (for instance, third gear at 50 km/h) and apply full throttle where appropriate to coax slippage from a badly-worn clutch, if the model you're considering has manual transmission.

In any model, be sure to check the level and condition of the engine oil. Though largely inconclusive, some owners have reported oil consumption in this generation Civic, and the owners community suggests it might come from some redesign to engine internals and the use of a "thinner" engine oil for fuel economy. If any oil consumption is noted between oil changes, talk to your Honda dealer and ensure they document it, in case you need to file a warranty claim.

Run the climate control blower motor on any model through all of its speed settings, listening for an excessive buzzing sound. If present, the culprit is likely a bad blend door located near the fan motor, causing a vibration. This should be a warranty-related issue, if detected.

One final note: Note that many used Civics will have been modified in some form or another by past owners. This is especially true on the Civic Si. Though light modifications are typically no cause for alarm (intake systems, exhaust, wheels), shoppers are advised to confirm that all parts, and their installation, are of high quality.

Also, for the average shopper, avoiding a model with modified suspension, re-programmed engine management or other more major modifications is a good idea.

JUSTIN PRITCHARD

TORSTAR NEWS SERVICE FILE

What owners like

Owners say Civic is manoeuvrable, comfortable and relatively solid to drive, though reliability and purchase confidence tend to be top on the list of purchase considerations. Owners note generous trunk space and good fuel efficiency, too.

What owners dislike

Common gripe points include some plasticky and low-budget interior bits, excessive road noise on some models, and an interior design that's highly functional, albeit boring to look at.

The verdict

The latest generation of one of the most reliable cars on the road seems to be largely free of worrisome or troubling issues. Problems will likely be easy to identify and fix during a pre-purchase inspection, and finding a healthy used Civic from this generation is largely a function of tracking down a model that's been well maintained and has all service records up to date.

Toyota's 'talking' cars get big buzz

TECHNOLOGY

System lets cars 'talk' with each other, infrastructure

Toyota will be using this year's Tokyo motor show to communicate why talking cars are the future of cleaner, safer personal mobility.

The Smart Mobility City 2015 is an event running alongside the main Tokyo show this year that will be examining the relationship between automobiles, people and society and the role of personal mobility in the city of tomorrow. And it is where Toyota will be showcasing the progress it has made with its Intelligent Transportation System (ITS) that enables cars to communicate with each other and with infrastructure elements such as traffic lights.

In other words, connected cars, an area where all automakers are busy developing solutions, but where Toyota is trying to establish an early lead.

Cars packed with radar, sensors and cameras can automatically stay in lane, maintain a safe speed from the vehicle in front and can even apply the brakes if a pedestrian steps out in front without looking. However, no set of cameras, no matter how smart, can see what's coming around a bend or at a blind junction. Hence car-to-car communication. If all cars "talked" to each other to say where they were, there would be no need to see around a bend in the first place.

That's the concept behind car-to-car communication and its related car-to-infrastructure communication technologies, and at the Smart Mobility City, a specially adapted Prius will be demonstrating how these technologies can make approaching junctions, turning right into traffic and maintaining a safe distance simpler, safer and more intuitive.

The system can also help authorities better manage the road network. Knowing in real time how many cars are using a stretch of highway gives advanced warning of potential congestion while drivers can better conserve fuel by knowing if and when the traffic light is about to change from green to red. BabyCam has digital eye on passengers Garmin wants to help you navigate towards better parenting with its latest device.

The babyCam, which the company claims is a world first, can wirelessly stream real-time video footage of backseat passengers to a Garmin GPS unit's display.

"We are excited to be the first company to create a new product category that integrates passenger video monitoring with GPS navigation," said Dan Bartel, Garmin vice-president of worldwide sales. "Having to awkwardly turn around or pull over on the side of the road to check on your child is simply unsafe. With babyCam, parents can easily monitor children as often as they need while running daily errands."

The babyCam can be fitted to the back of a car seat — via the headrest — and can be angled to capture one or all rear passengers. It also works in low-light conditions and, crucially, responds to voice commands, rather than touches or swipes, meaning the driver needn't take his or her hands off the wheel in order to check in on the children.

The device will go on sale this January for $199.99 US without the GPS unit. AFP

However, before it comes to market, Volvo is going to get busy with hybrids and ensure that there is a petrol/electric variant of each of its models available for environmentally conscious consumers. AFP

A whole new foundation for the Brow architect

"Change is constant," says Louise Green. "And embracing change helps me to thrive."

More than a decade ago, Louise Green left a successful career in IT to start over as an aesthetician. Thanks to her passion, attention to detail and commitment to continuous improvement, Louise quickly earned a solid reputation for flawless technique and exceptional service. Clients began to refer to her — fondly and respectfully — as the Brow Architect.

Determined to take her craft to the next level, Louise Green co-launched Spa Junkie, a beauty boutique in downtown Ottawa. She implemented a unique training program that helped drive the business' success and set new standards for waxing, sugaring and personalized, attentive service.

Earlier this year, Louise Green left Spa Junkie to launch her latest venture, Foundation Beauty & Style, in Ottawa's ByWard market. She delivers the same top-quality services by private appointment in an elegant and relaxing atmosphere.

"I do what I love," says Green, "and applying my technique and artistry lies at the foundation of what I do."

In an industry where service quality is inconsistent — "everyone has a horror story," she says — Green appreciates both the value and advantages of proper technique.

"Connecting one-on-one with my clients every day is such a pleasure for me," says Green. My clients inspire me to be at the top of my game, every day."

GASTHAUS TRADITION IS ALIVE AND WELL

For Heidi Webster, creating a comfortable, homey environment for visitors runs in the blood. A century ago, her great-grandparents owned and operated a gasthaus (guest house) in Grotzingen, a quaint medieval town in Germany's Black Forest region.

Keeping with local tradition, the gasthaus was a combination tavern, restaurant and banquet hall that offered rooms for rent on both a short- and long-term basis. Webster (née Stutz) maintains the family heritage in a building designed by her architect father, who immigrated to Canada in the early 1950s.

"When my father designed the building in the early 1970s, he set out to recreate the cozy warmth and hospitality of his childhood," says Heidi Webster, General Manager of Cartier Place. "We keep that tradition alive while adding all of the modern conveniences."

With 250 spacious suites — all with kitchen facilities and private balconies — Cartier Place is a unique offering in Ottawa's competitive hotel market. Along with a games room and children's playroom, Cartier Place features an indoor pool, whirlpool, sauna, exercise room and private garden patio — all a short walk from the Rideau Canal and Parliament Hill. Along with the acclaimed restaurant Café Mezzaluna off the lobby, the hotel has deluxe banquet facilities. The combination helped Cartier Place earn the 2014 Booking.com Award of Excellence.

"By operating as a family business, we keep the gasthaus tradition alive," says Heidi Webster.

MLB PLAYOFFS

K.C. bounces back from loss to take 3-1 series lead

Ben Zobrist and Alex Rios homered as Kansas City roughed up Toronto starter R.A. Dickey early and the bullpen late en route to a lopsided 14-2 victory that pushed the Blue Jays to the playoff precipice Tuesday.

The Royals lead the best-of-seven American League Championship Series 3-1, meaning Toronto now faces its fourth must-win game of the post-season.

Game 5 goes Wednesday at the Rogers Centre with Toronto's Marco Estrada facing Edinson Volquez in a rematch of Game 1 at Kauffman Stadium.

"It's a do-or-die game for us, but they do it all year," Toronto manager John Gibbons said. "These guys will let this one go, and they'll show up to play tomorrow."

Things got so bad that the Jays sent in infielder Cliff Pennington to pitch with two outs and two on in the ninth. He got an ovation that grew louder with a 90 m.p.h. first strike.

He then gave up two runs on back-to-back singles in an unexpected seven-pitch outing before Russell Martin saved him with a foul catch at the Jays dugout.

Pennington, in his first ever mound appearance, is the first position player to pitch in a post-season game, according to Sportsnet Stats and ESPN Stats.

Kansas City led 5-0 with just four outs to silence the Rogers Centre crowd of 49,501. Dickey lasted one out longer, having dispatched just five of the 12 batters he faced in the shortest start in Jays' playoff history.

The first four Royals got on base and ultimately scored. The four runs in the top of the first were an ALCS record.

Kansas City added four insurance runs in the seventh, sending eight to the plate. There were three more runs in the eighth as Gibbons, electing not to use his top relievers in a lost cause, watched another eight Royals hit.

The Jays, who rallied from an 0-2 hole to down Texas in the best-of-five ALDS, are trying to become just the third team to overcome multiple 0-2 deficits in a single post-season, according to Elias Sports. The Dodgers (1981) and Royals (1985 when they trailed the Blue Jays in the ALCS) both did it.

They have their work cut out for them, needing to win three straight. There is no margin of error.

Estrada kept the Jays alive with a win in Game 3 of the ALDS in Texas.

The Royals pitchers have shut down the free-swinging Toronto bats in three of four games. The Jays, who led the majors with 891 runs in the regular season, have scored zero, three, 11 and two against Kansas City.

On the plus side, Toronto got 4-1/3 innings of one-hit shutout relief from Liam Hendriks after Dickey flamed out.

But LaTroy Hawkins and Ryan Tepera were treated like batting practice in the seventh and eighth.

In contrast, Royals relievers Luke Hochevar, Ryan Madson, Kelvin Herrera and Franklin Morales blanked the Jays.

While Dickey struggled, Chris Young got the job done for the Royals. The six-foot-10 255-pounder, who was working up two runs on three hits. He had two walks and four strikeouts.

+ EXTRA EYES

The Royals think there's more to the Blue Jays' home-field advantage than just loud sell-out crowds.

Pitcher Edinson Volquez said that teammate Johnny Cueto believes the Blue Jays are using a plant in the centre-field stands of Rogers Centre to steal signs.

Cueto was chased from Kansas City's 11-8 loss in Toronto on Monday night after giving up six hits and eight runs in just two innings of work.

"He said, I think he said last night, they got a guy in centre field," said Volquez, who is scheduled to start on Wednesday in Game 5 of the ALCS. "You see how hard it is, he look to the centre field and he see somebody do this or do that, it's really hard to do that."

"But when the guy gets on second base, he said something about that, too, they were giving signs to the hitter."

The Blue Jays had a 53-28 record at Rogers Centre this season, but were 40-41 on the road.

Dominant Bayern stunned by Gunners

CHAMPIONS LEAGUE

Munich's good work undone by rare error from Neuer

Goals from Olivier Giroud and Mesut Ozil helped Arsenal end a run of two consecutive defeats in the Champions League with a morale-boosting 2-0 victory over Bayern Munich on Tuesday.

Arsenal knew that victory in at least one of its next two matches against Bayern would be vital for advancing from Group F, and it managed to inflict a first defeat of the season on Pep Guardiola's side.

Arsenal now has three points in the group and is third after three matches, with Bayern staying top on six points. Olympiakos is second on goal difference with six points after beating Dinamo Zagreb 1-0.

Substitute Giroud gave Arsenal the lead when he bundled the ball into the net on the 77th minute, after Manuel Neuer rushed off his line and failed to claim a free-kick into the penalty area from Santi Cazorla.

Ozil sealed the win in stoppage time, converting a cross at the byline from Hector Bellerin. Neuer hooked the ball away, but only after it had crossed the line. Bayern controlled possession throughout the first half at the Emirates Stadium and Arsenal relied on saves from Petr Cech to deny Thiago Alcantara and Douglas Costa.

Yet for all the German side's dominance, it was Arsenal which went closest to taking the lead before halftime.

Nacho Monreal delivered a precise cross from the left in the 33rd minute, finding Theo Walcott unmarked on the six yard line. The striker flicked a header at goal, only for Neuer to make an astounding one-handed save to claw the ball off the line.

Cech came to Arsenal's rescue again in the second half, making an opening one-handed save when Robert Lewandowski was through on goal in the 75th minute. It was a particularly vital block, as Arsenal got the free kick which resulted in the first goal in its next foray forward. Arsenal next faces Munich in Germany in two weeks' time.

There could be trouble from UEFA before then, following a protest about ticket prices.

Hundreds of seats were left vacant in the Bayern supporters section for the first five minutes of the game, with two signs placed across the rows of seats

Election date released as FIFA purge rolls on Sticking with plans for a presidential election in February and revealing a series of reforms, FIFA sought to move the scandal-tarnished governing body into a new era on Tuesday.

But the shadow of corruption will return on Wednesday when ethics investigators reveal the identity of senior officials facing sanctions.

The new freedom to lift the veil of secrecy on cases will be exercised — once the accused have been notified — after FIFA's executive committee approved a request by its ethics court.

Sitting on FIFA's soon-to-be-overhauled ruling body as a senior vice-president is Angel Maria Villar, who The Associated Press has previously reported is under investigation in the corruption probe into the bidding contests for the 2018 and 2022 World Cups but has never been publicly named by the executive body.

The Spanish federation head is de facto acting UEFA president following Michel Platini's provisional suspension two weeks ago over a 2011 payment from FIFA. German great Franz Beckenbauer, who was a FIFA voter when Russia was chosen to host the 2018 World Cup and Qatar secured the 2022 tournament, is also under scrutiny.

NHL

Chicago's Keith out for 4-6 weeks after knee surgery

Blackhawks defenceman Duncan Keith will be sidelined for four to six weeks after he had right knee surgery on Tuesday.

Keith, a two-time Norris Trophy winner, has two assists in six games this season. The team says he had a meniscal tear repaired.

The loss of Keith, who won the Conn Smythe Trophy last season for playoff MVP, is a huge blow for the Stanley Cup champions. They play in one of the NHL's toughest divisions, and every point could make a difference at the end of the year.

Keith is likely headed for long-term injured reserve, giving the Blackhawks some cap relief. Lubomir Visnovsky, a defence veteran who was with the team during training camp, may be brought back, or they could promote someone from the minors. THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

- 2 Tbsp lime juice
- 4 Tbsp sour cream
- 2 Tbsp lime juice
- A good pinch of salt

★ IT'S ALL IN THE STARS by Sally Brompton

Aries March 21 - April 20
Tackle problems one at a time or your efforts won't amount to much. There may be one or two minor nuisances between now and the Sun's change of signs on Friday but nothing you cannot comfortably handle.

Taurus April 21 - May 21
You don't have to justify your opinions to anyone. You are entitled to your beliefs and are under no obligation to submit to cross-examination.

Gemini May 22 - June 21
Let your thoughts roam. There are no limits to what you can imagine and there are no limits to what you can achieve. If others think that your ideas are bizarre, agree with them and change nothing.

Cancer June 22 - July 23
You deal with whatever challenges you face with ease. Your confidence is so high at the moment that even so-called superiors will come to you for advice.

Leo July 24 - Aug. 23
You may be on a tight schedule but you must still make time for people who depend on you. Those who are feeling crushed by events desperately need a touch of your can-do spirit.

Virgo Aug. 24 - Sept. 23
This is a good time to convince others that you know what you are talking about. Whether that is actually true remains to be seen, but your powers of persuasion are such that no one will disbelieve you.

Libra Sept. 24 - Oct. 23
There are people in your social circle who envy you for your popularity and are plotting to make you look bad. Be on your guard. Watch out for those who flatter you too much.

Scorpio Oct. 24 - Nov. 22
You have enviable self-belief. But you will convince yourself, wrongly, that you can master something that is simply beyond you. You don't have to be good at everything.

Sagittarius Nov. 23 - Dec. 21
Your confidence may be high but don't take too much for granted, because what you gain through confidence today could easily be lost through over-confidence when the Sun changes signs on Friday.

Capricorn Dec. 22 - Jan. 20
If you are going to disagree with someone make sure you stick to the facts, because if you exaggerate they will make you look stupid. If the facts are not strong enough to back up your case, then keep quiet.

Aquarius Jan. 21 - Feb. 19
Keep things simple and don't look for difficult answers when easy ones will do. You can tie yourself in knots trying to understand the unknowable.

Pisces Feb. 20 - March 20
Keep your wits when dealing with cash and investments. It is unlikely that anyone is trying to cheat you. Just because someone else has made a mistake does not mean you have to make it too.
